CHANGES SEEN IN HOG BUSINESS

The hog itself is being partially remodeled . . and so is the way he is being produced and managed. E. M. Godsey, swine specialist at VPI, says the lean meat-type hog is the vogue these days. And more and more hogs are being produced in the so-called "central hog system."

The central hog system is designed for large-scale hog production. It is operated with specialized management and will produce and market from 1,000 to 10,000 more hogs a year. At present the central systems are producing from 3 to 5 per cent of the hogs in the country. This type of production was almost non-existent five years ago.

The more familiar "farm system" refers to any system that fits the need of the general farmer raising hogs. The central system will be very competitive with the farm system in the future, and the farm system hog producer in the bottom half of the efficiency ladder likely will soon be out of business. But, Godsey says, the farm-system producer who is really efficient will never be put out of business.

Game Wardens Nab 442 Violators in January

Some 442 persons arrested by Virginia game wardens were convicted of game and fish law violations during the month of January, state game law commission enforcement chief Welsh Mistyete reports.

The 425 convicted for violating game laws and the 17 convicted for breaking fish laws were assessed $7,599 in fines, which goes into the state literary fund, and $2,505.89 in court costs, the chief said.

Eight of the game law convictions were for spotlighting deer, the fine for which is $250, he noted.

The state's game warden force traveled 315,097 miles and inspected 23,264 hunting and fishing licenses during the month, he stated.
